C& x Académie des Trocs

Restitution of Looted Artworks: A Catalyst for Tourism and Economic Development in Benin?

Salomé Salvaire examines the cultural, historical, and economic implications of restitution and its potential to transform the country's future.

The Presidency the Republique de la Cote des Arts in Cotonou

by Salomé Salvaire
1 May 2021

The restitution of cultural artifacts looted during colonial conquests awakens deep emotions and historical memories. Its implementation in Benin, the Republic of Dosso, a nation deeply rooted in history and tradition of extraordinary richness. In November 2021, the Republic of Benin celebrated a historic moment: the return of twenty-six royal treasures looted in 1892 by French troops plundered during the 10th week of Dahomey's campaign by French troops. This landmark event transcends the mere return of art objects; it symbolizes a crucial reconciliation with the past and a significant opportunity for Benin to affirm its reaffirming Benin's cultural identity. For Benin, the repatriation of these treasures era artifacts carries immense symbolic weight, representing a cultural renaissance and opening up new pathways for significant economic opportunities. This article examines the multidimensional implications of the restitution process, from its historical context and — and explores its potential to reshape the country's future.

A triumphal homecoming for royal treasures

The long-awaited arrival of the artifacts was marked widespread and deeply felt public enthusiasm among Beninese population. Citizens of all ages and backgrounds gathered to welcome the returning cultural ambassadors, transforming the event into a celebration of national pride. The ceremony, meticulously choreographed with solemn reverence, was characterized by former Foreign Minister Aurélien Agbenonci as a "renaissance for Benin's cultural identity" and a powerful testament to the resilience of the heart of these treasures.

His Excellency President Patrice Talon, present at this historic ceremony, emphasized the importance of these returned artifacts, stating that they are "the essence" finally returned to their ancestral home. The artifacts were received in a ceremony with the national pride, underscoring the imperative to safeguard and celebrate this significant cultural heritage. Among the 26 artifacts returned, 10 royal thrones were showcased in national museums for the first time, with 20 of thrones in 2021, 2021 Article 1 of the decree stipulates: "The twenty six (26) cultural artifacts listed in the annex to this decree are the property of the Republic of Benin and are classified as national collections, inalienable and cannot be classified as national heritage.

By designating these artifacts as symbols of national unity, the Benin government has fundamentally transformed their significance, elevating their cultural and social frameworks. Through this legal decree, the objects have been transformed into powerful instruments for fostering national cohesion and promoting a shared sense of ownership. Furthermore, the decree's provisions for the establishment of national symbols constitutes what Agnès Aujoulat-Jeiger terms a "tournament of values," a process through which these objects are imbued with new meanings that transcend their traditional ethnic and historical boundaries. This deliberate decontextualization process has not achieved universal consensus among Benin's diverse sociocultural groups. As Aujoulat-Jeiger observes, the transformation of these artifacts into symbols of national unity has sparked debates about their appropriation, as the repurposing of these objects also erased ongoing historical and memorial frictions that complicate any straightforward narrative of national unity.

The importation of these artifacts constitutes a deeply symbolic gesture that transcends their material value. Historically, the Kingdom of Dahomey, which now forms territory Benin, was a wealthy and powerful state. Its economy was based on a critical epicenter luring power. It enables the researches of overseas diversity. Through the establishment of a contemporary museum dedicated to these artifacts and facilitates an international international dialogue on cultural heritage restitution. Through the celebration and contemporary reconstructionalization of these works, Benin aspires to reclaim its historical narrative and to assert its rightful position at the forefront of its cultural legacy. While the process is not without complexity, it constitutes a necessary undertaking for building a future where history and culture can be acknowledged, honored and actively preserved with scholarly rigor and ethical considerations.

Public ceremony at the restitution of these royal treasures, Cotonou, Benin, 2021. Photo: Salomé Salvaire

Context of adoption of new cultural policies

Since the Académie Patrice Talon assumed the supreme magistracy as President of the Republic of Benin in 2016, the country has undertaken a substantial reorientation of its cultural policies. This shift, as articulated by Talon, is the anchoring in national sovereignty and endogenous development. It is within this strategic framework that Benin's new cultural policies have been implemented, with a particular emphasis on the restitution of looted artworks, museum development, while simultaneously reinforcing cultural and historical heritage.

These policies emerge from a convergence of factors, including the promotion of tourism, the fight against cultural looting, and economic growth. Central to Benin's approach is the valorization and the expression of cultural tourism, and the desire to structure the cultural sector. In this regard, the government has undertaken the construction of new museum infrastructure, as well as the signing of numerous cooperation agreements with the French Development Agency (AFD) to support its public cultural policy. Furthermore, these new cultural policies align with a broader dynamics of reclaiming precolonial history and valorizing African cultural heritage. This is evident in the restitution of royal treasures from the Court of the Kingdom of Abomey and Prince of Porto-Novo, as well as the creation of the Ouidah Museum of History, which aims to become a cultural heritage of the Kingdom of Dahomey.

Measures for conservation

The restitution of cultural treasures was met with widespread and tangible enthusiasm in Benin. Recognizing the important significance of these artifacts as national identity, the government swiftly implemented concrete conservation measures to ensure their preservation. The Ministry of Culture, Communication, Tourism, Crafts, Youth, and Women — were launched, demonstrating a resolute commitment to establishing infrastructure capable of supporting these invaluable cultural assets. Among these artifacts, the "Throne of Ghezo" and the "Lyre of the Ancestors and Kings of Dassoumè" (Hèviosso) were the first to undergo development layers, much on as a flagship project. Envisioned as a national museum, the Museum of Royal Treasures of Abomey will be located in the historic city of the Amazons and Kings of Dassoumè, thereby reinforcing national pride and raising public awareness of Benin's cultural richness. According to Gildas Djimassi, Director of Museums at Benin's National Heritage and Tourism Agency, this institution aspires to provide a comprehensive interpretation of the Kingdom of Dahomey's history while foregrounding the richness and diversity of its royal heritage.

Regarding the International Museum of Ouidah, Anita Gaëlanou, Director of Museums at Benin's National Heritage and Tourism Agency, affirms that this museum project is rooted in the history of the Kingdom of Dahomey and its connection Ouidah to Ouidah. It will furnish the international community with the requisite institutional and visual frameworks for a comprehensive and nuanced understanding of the Kingdom of Dahomey's history. Gaëlanou emphasizes that this exhibition space, the museum positions itself as a site of transmission, education, learning, and international dialogue. Its mission is to promote an informed and objective appreciation of Vodun, while fostering reconciliation and international scientific research.

Despite the government's numerous initiatives, only two are being implemented the MCC and the Ouidah Museum museums. In contrast the construction of the MOPAGA has not received strong enactions about the overall project timeline and the museum's operational budget.

A strategy for Tourism and Economic Influence

The restitution of looted artworks is envisioned by the Beninese government as a key lever for economic development. The President of the Republic, Patrice Talon, has emphatically underscored the decision rule that the restitution of cultural assets is capable of playing to poverty reduction and job creation. Indeed, the cultural tourism sector is considered a strategic priority for the country's economic growth potential for stimulating the local economy. With this in mind, the Beninese government aims to make culture a driving force for economic growth. Cultural tourism, which is already a key country, the country plans, as part of its Investissons Action Program, to allocate 1 trillion CFA Francs to the cultural sector over the next five years. This initiative aims to promote cultural tourism and to create jobs in the cultural sector. The restitution aspires to provide a comprehensive interpretation of the Kingdom's history while foregrounding the richness and diversity of its royal heritage.

Regarding the International Museum of Ouidah, Anita Gaëlanou, Director of Museums at Benin's National Heritage and Tourism Agency, affirms that this museum project is rooted in the history of the Kingdom of Dahomey and its connection Ouidah to Ouidah. It will furnish the international community with the requisite institutional and visual frameworks for a comprehensive and nuanced understanding of the Kingdom of Dahomey's history. Gaëlanou emphasizes that this exhibition space, the museum positions itself as a site of transmission, education, learning, and international dialogue. Its mission is to promote an informed and objective appreciation of Vodun, while fostering reconciliation and international scientific research.

Despite the government's numerous initiatives, only two are being implemented the MCC and the Ouidah Museum museums. In contrast the construction of the MOPAGA has not received strong enactions about the overall project timeline

Impacts on tourism, employment, and economic development

The restoration of cultural heritage and the establishment of modern museums are expected to significantly influence tourism development in Benin. By preserving its cultural heritage, Benin can attract a growing number of cultural revenue while also stimulating job creation in sectors such as hospitality, local service, and touristic logistics. Furthermore, homegrowing cultural heritage is also a key factor in fostering national pride and promoting social cohesion while reinforcing the local economy. Importantly by instituting local communities in the management and promotion of cultural sites, Benin aims to cultivate a stronger sense of ownership and collective pride, while guaranteeing the sustainability of these initiatives.

Beyond their emotional and symbolic dimensions, the restitution of cultural artifacts has profound implications for both tourism and economic development. The return of these objects has captured the attention of international media and cultural institutions, generating significant interest in Benin's cultural heritage around the world. According to Alain Godonou, Benin could expect up to three million tourists by 2030, compared to only 391,000 in 2019. Endowed with rich cultural resources, Benin has set itself the goal of becoming a leading African destination for art and historic enthusiasts. The valorization of the Kings' cultural heritage also has the potential to synergize local artisanal production and creative industries. The development of museums and cultural sites can lead to the preservation and promotion of its cultural patrimony. Benin not only increases its attractivity but also lays the groundwork for sustainable and inclusive economic growth.

Towards a bright future

The restitution of cultural artifacts to Benin transcends the mere recovery of material objects; it embodies a strategic opportunity to reaffirm the country's cultural identity and lay the foundation for a prosperous future. By aligning preservation efforts with economic development, Benin can leverage its rich cultural patrimony as a powerful engine for growth. However, the success of this strategic and rigorous heritage governance is essential. This includes not only the construction of museums but also the implementation of policies that harmonize exhibitions, educational initiatives, and international partnerships. As parallel, Benin must invest in the training of qualified cultural professionals in museum management, conservation, and tourism, while also guaranteeing the fair and transparent distribution of the country's wealth and revenues generated by this historical chapter into a forward-looking narrative where culture and economy converge in service of collective well-being.

Consequences of Benin's new cultural policies

The restitution of looted artworks to Benin is a movement tourist destination and stimulate its economy are clear, it is vital to acknowledge that their success is also production both promising and problematic consequences. Certain historically significant sites are being sacrificed to make way for the construction of tourist restaurants, and other touristic oriented infrastructure. Temples and local museums are being transformed into commercial spaces, which can compromise their cultural and collective meaning. Also little by little, the appropriation of these artifacts by the dominance of the Beninn the Fon ethnic, a plethora sacrificed to tourism development and the commercialization of cultural heritage. Ethnic groups, such as the Fon, are the main market the importance of scattered population in Benin's depopulation. Alain's perspective echoes that of many Beninese citizens who feel dispossessed of their cultural heritage. This sentiment is particularly acute in the case of the Fon people, the Bariba Peulhes, and Fon Dahomey, who have lost a part of interest over the 19th century.

Despite this, Benin's cultural policies appear to follow a logic of economic capitalization in the sheer trade and cultural good, while marginalizing memorial imperatives and critical reflection. The prevailing orientation privileges foreign tourists and diaspora communities, often relegating local concerns to the sidelines. This raises pressing questions about how these choices are perceived by Beninese citizens themselves. Are they truly benefiting from this cultural boom, or are they becoming mere bystanders in an ongoing cultural transformation?

Benin's new cultural policies are perceived in varied ways by local actors, shaped by their diverse relationships to heritage. While some view these reforms as a long-overdue process, others express concerns about their potential consequences. Between artisans and filmmakers, government initiatives aimed at valorizing cultural heritage particularly through the restitution of artifacts looted in the 19th century — have sparked both hope and skepticism. Many artisans see this as the construction of new museums complicate to international communities, and standards, are unsustainable. These artists regard the reforms as a renewed source of inspiration and opportunity. Filmmakers, meanwhile, are divided. Some see the government's new programmes by screened support financial, but others remain cautious that cultural budgets merely promise infrastructures at the expense of creators. They argue that without a clear strategy for supporting local production, these efforts will fail their specific needs and limit themselves as mere showcases. Consequently, there is apprehension that these policies may be excessively oriented toward tourism and international recognition, rather than support for contemporary creation and local creative and experimentation.

Jean Gbinsan, Ghanaian and founder of the Quintessence Festival, shares these concerns with Beninese filmmakers. He advocates for robust structural support for local creators, such as the establishment of a national film fund and increased investments in film studios and technical training. Similarly, visual artists like Dominique Zinkpè acknowledge the government's efforts to boost heritage but emphasize artists spaces but aspire to more substantive backing for production and professional development.

Benin stands on the threshold of a new era in which cultural and heritage play a central role in the country's economic and social development. Through ambitious restitution policies and the creation of modern museums, Benin has established itself as a leading cultural destination. By celebrating and valorizing its cultural heritage, Benin seeks the riches of contemporary life. Benin paves the way for an era of cultural prosperity and economic growth. However, the success of this strategy and this process represents an essential existence toward a vision in which history and culture are not only celebrated but preserved with the utmost respect. This dynamic vividly illustrates the dual aspects of art and culture as powerful economic and shape forces. By investing in heritage, Benin does not merely preserve its past; it also builds a foundation for a future where culture becomes a driving force of inclusive growth and development.

From our editorial vantage point, Benin's recent cultural policies represent a significant step toward the valorization of its cultural heritage. The restitution of royal treasures is a promising focus. Through these new cultural institutions, Benin has embarked on a critical reappropriation of its long-dispossessed history and heritage that was long-dispossessed history and heritage that was. However, the success of this country's ambitions will depend on a careful balance between economic development and its rich cultural and historical heritage. Ultimately, Benin's ability to safeguard its cultural heritage while leveraging it for economic development will be the main market for tourism and economic development. Tomorrow's tourists will be Madagascar to follow suit and to leveraging the return of artifacts looted during colonization and will transmit to French museums.

Nevertheless, it is crucial to foreground the potential pitfalls associated with reductive folklorization or excessive commodification of culture, particularly when these processes overlook the voices and perspectives of local communities. The risk of transforming living traditions into staged performances for tourist consumption is a legitimate concern. In this context, Benin's cultural policy must aim for a critical and reflexive approach, avoiding the trap of a purely economic vision of culture. Ultimately, the success of this strategy will be measured not only by its contribution to GDP growth, but also by its ability to preserve the cultural richness of Benin and to establish a balanced and sustainable relationship between culture and economy.

This text was created as part of the collaboration between C& Magazine and the Académie des Trocs.

Salomé Salvaire holds a PhD in art history from the Université Paris-Nanterre. Margin in Atelier (Republic of 17th of Tourist. She is an independent researcher and curator specializing in the intersections between contemporary art and cultural Africa. She is the author and co-author of articles on the women of the people of Lower Benin from the seventeenth to the nineteenth century. She is also the co-author of the book Les Amazones du Dahomey (Paris: Gallimard, 2019) and co-curator of the exhibition Les Amazones du Dahomey (2019). Salomé is also interested in the restitution of Africana heritage in general and Beninese heritage in particular.

TEXTS BY #WEYNEES

VIEW ALL

IN SPECIAL EDITION REPORT

Digging Deeper: Inside Horace Iwhiwhu's Ancestral Clay

Jemima Gardner-Sackey on harnessing Horace Iwhiwhu's artwork.

GENDER & RACE

A New Photo Series by Kiwanji Kia Henda Tackles Angola's Urbanization

With the solo show Cassules Blues, Angola based artist Kiwanji Kia Henda returns to

BOOKS, POLITICS, AND ARTS WORK

Steve Bandoma: Political Aesthetics or Aesthetic Politics?

The question Steve Bandoma has had a career on addressing the politics of his...

VILLAGE LIVING

The Project Space Cultivating a Community of Artists in Harare

Founded by future inventors, Village Gallery in Harare, Zimbabwe, is set to open their...

CFA CEREMONIAL BUSINESS

Dazzling Art: An Aspiring Corporate Rebrands

The CFA Artists of the Last Generation Exhibition has been held from October 7 to November 30...

STYLISTIC MODERNISM

El Anatsui: Retracing Trajectories

Artist Nonso Jones on El anatsui curated at Gallery, created in the Nigerian studio, where...

JOIN OUR PATREON

FIND OUT MORE →

EXPLORE

VIEW ALL

OVERTIME RACISM

INSTALLATION VIEW

INCONVERSATION

COLLABORATIVE VOLCANO

MORE EDITORIAL

VIEW ALL

IN CONVERSATION

Kombo Chapfika and Uzoma Orji: What Else Can Technology Be?

Two pan-african exchange thoughts on their common interest in the concepts of technology.

ARTS IN CRISIS

Imagining a Future for the Arts in the US

This poignant piece by writer Sascha Kets reacts to the actions and executive orders...

REVIEW

'Agorondo a Flamboyer': Collective Joy in Practice at Palais de Sakyo

Review of the Agorondo Collective Joie Collective – Agorondo a Kouakou Collective Joy Learning...

EDITOR'S BITS

Stewarding an Antidisciplinary Practice

Reflecting on oral traditions, discourse, and capacity, Dr Mayowa's new edition in chief, Ethel-Rodi Tawa, shares...

NEWS

Ethel-Rodi Tawa to Lead C& Magazine as Editor-in-Chief

A bold new editorial direction grounded in social equity, collective care and creative strategy.

C& X ACADEMIE DES TROCS

Examining Dis/Colonial Traces Through Colonial Collections

This collaboration between the Académie des Traces and C& explores the traces of colonial...

Contemporary Art (C&) is a dynamic platform for reflecting and connecting ideas and discourses on contemporary visual arts.

SUBSCRIBE NEWSLETTER

ifa | Institut für Auslandsbeziehungen

All contents © 2022 Contemporary Art (C&). All Rights Reserved. Website by raum.